R

rabbit; cottontail; hare n. mishjíñe ~ mishchíñe (L); misjíñe ~ mischíñe (O.). jackrabbit n. mishjíⁿxáñe (L); misjíⁿxáⁿje (O.); mishchíⁿxáñe (L); mischíⁿxáⁿje (O.). [W. wašjink; wašjinkxéte (jack rabbit); Om/P. mašdinge ~ mašchinge]. white rabbit n. mišjíⁿhga; (mishcinthka (DOR)). rabbit lying under the snow v.i. wikóge (DOR).

 Rabbit (also known as the “The Orphan”) (Wékaⁿ) Wónihšíñe (L); Wónihšíñe (O.). [NOTE: The Rabbit is a cultural distinguished personage for the traditional Ioway, Otoe-Missouria Peoples. He occurs in many traditional stories, and is a renown benefactor of mankind. However, he was and is not considered a “Spiritual Grandfather,” who continues to morally effect world forces nor be of general assistance to humanity.

Indeed, the Rabbit is somewhat like the Trickster, Ishjíⁿki. He too, can be a deceiver. He can be deceitful or ingenious; he may be smart, yet foolish. Like Ishjíⁿki, he reflects the ageless contradictions evident in mankind. However, he has two aspects that are different. He is a culture hero that incidentally serves as a role model of daring and strength. For this insignificant, humble animal of the Plains is frequently scorned in many of the Wékaⁿ (Traditional Stories) and often presumed a coward. But from his humbleness, arises an undaunted champion of the common people, one who challenges a village of grasshoppers to return the tobacco to his Indian uncles, who questions the unanswered and captures Grandfather Sun and later, he determines to slay an abusive Bear Chief who exploits and sacrifices the welfare and well-being of his people for personal comfort and pleasure.

The Rabbit is the son of a Native woman and the Morning Star. SEE: “Wekan: The Sisters Who Married Stars.” As the two sisters fled from the lower heavens, the second sister, the mother of Rabbit, fell to her death into the garden of the Old Woman, Hina ~ Hinkúñi Máyan. The following morning, the Old Woman found her corn, beans and squash trampled and many little footprints all around. She made a corn husk doll and a bow and arrow, placing both on the ground in the garden. She returned the next morning and found that the doll remained, and therefore, it was a boy child, whom she caught and took home with her, as she knew he was her Grandson. So that is how Rabbit came to live with his Grandmother, Máyaⁿ, (Mother and/or Grandmother Earth - Woman Spirit). She is differentiated from máyaⁿ, the ground and land, by the use of the kinship terms. She calls men (Native mankind) as “her sons”, and the Native women as “her daughters”. As such, she tells her grandson, the Rabbit: The women are Rihúⁿ, “your mothers” (mother’s sisters), and the men are Rijéga, “your uncles” (mother’s brothers)]. SEE: kinship.
